Suri
A FRIEND MADE MANIFEST
Suri had watched Rook and the others as they descended into the ruins of Gehenna. She was keen to see such an ancient city built by those from her native realm, but was disappointed to find it in shambles. She knew, of course, that those from Arkalla had long since left the place, but its decay was still hard to see.

The entire endeavor that her friends now pursued seemed like a fool's errand to her, but she would always be there to support Rook. He had shown her kindness, and had a sharp mind. She had already learned much from him.

As they descended further into the sunken library, it became clear that the danger they faced was more serious than they expected. It seemed to be a trend with these humans, and Suri thought that they may benefit from a bit more caution. They were in too far to turn back now, anyway.

Remi was growing concerned for Rook. He hadn't been able to rest since they arrived, and it was beginning to show. He had been tending to Remi, who had suffered an injury, and as usual he put the safety of others before his own well-being. It was something that Suri liked about him. He was reliable. If a friend was in need, he never hesitated. It was strange to her, but also reassuring. She knew that he would always be willing to assist her.

Now, Rook was alone, standing guard over an injured Remi. Monsters were closing in on them, and the situation was becoming dire. She began to weigh her options. Rook might die here if she didn't intervene, but if she did, there was a chance that the Great Bounty would be alerted and come for her. It wasn't a likely outcome, but it was a possibility. What would Rook do?

Suri knew immediately what she had to do. Rook would never leave her in danger, regardless of the consequences. She manifested next to him as he prepared to fight and gave him a confident nod. It was odd. She had never felt this way before, but she knew that Rook would have done the same for her.
